Additionally, you may be provided with medications to help you throughout the recovery process.

Types of Prescription Drug Abuse Programs for Addiction

There are typical classes of addiction treatment programs, depending on the modalities and types of addiction. Over the years, individual programs and treatment approaches have been evolving. While such evolution and diversification may be useful, it has led to the emergence of programs that cannot fit well into the traditional drug addiction treatment classification.

The common types of prescription drug abuse programs for addiction include:

- Prescription drug inpatient rehab
- Prescription drug outpatient rehab
- Prescription drug individualized and group therapy

Here is a brief overview of each program:

1. Prescription Drug Inpatient Rehab

In a prescription drug inpatient rehab, you will be required to stay at a rehabilitation facility for a specified period. Usually, this setup is best for you if your therapists believe that you cannot recover independently because you heavily depend on prescription drugs.

2. Prescription Drug Outpatient Rehab

The prescription drug outpatient rehab describes a rehabilitation setup where you go to a rehab facility for lessons and back to your residency. Usually, this approach best suits a monthly, weekly, or daily arrangement depending on your specific preferences and availability. The advantage of this type of program is that you can continue with your daily activities.

3. Prescription Drug Individualized or Group Therapy

Individualized or group therapy, often referred to as counseling, involves a medical professional attached to work with you to guide you throughout the recovery process. Usually, individualized or group therapy is applicable for both inpatient and outpatient rehabilitation.

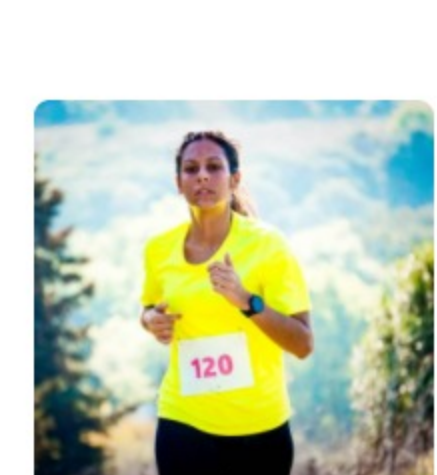

The individualized therapy's success depends on the confidentiality, level of care, and safety of the rehab settings. Such an environment allows the patient to open up freely regarding their challenges, feelings, and beliefs.
