
Treatment Centers Legal Guidelines You Should Know

Posted on July 2, 2021

It's difficult to watch a loved one battle with addiction. Substance abuse disorders can harm every part of a person's life, including family issues, poor career performance, and involvement with the criminal justice system. The most common desire shared by most relatives and friends in this situation is to assist their loved ones in receiving substance abuse treatment.

Of course, persuading someone to accept treatment isn't always easy. Many persons who are struggling with substance misuse initially refuse help and guidance from their loved ones. Many states have implemented addiction treatment legislation in response to the rising prevalence of substance use disorders to assist those who are unwilling or unable to help themselves.

However, a big part of the treatment is about knowing your rights as a patient. Therefore, you should know some legal guidelines for treating drug and alcohol addictions at Findlay Recovery Center, Ohio.

Drug and Alcohol Treatment at Findlay Recovery Center, Ohio

Individuals suffering from drug or alcohol addiction in Ohio are sometimes willing to seek expert help. Unfortunately, many people who are addicted to drugs or alcohol are resistant to treatment. As a result, the number of states with drug and alcohol treatment legislation is increasing.

Involuntary commitment laws are currently in place in 37 states and the District of Columbia. However, people suffering from alcoholism and drug addiction are eligible for involuntary commitment in Rhode Island and Montana. In contrast, those suffering from drug addiction are only eligible in Vermont.

Treatment Centers Legal Guidelines You Should Know

Individuals with substance use problems or mental health illnesses may be declared incapable of caring for their own health at some time, but this does not deprive them of basic rights, such as confidentiality. The value of confidentiality in any healthcare setting is vital, but when it comes to substance abuse, indiscretion or unauthorized sharing of patient information can result in job loss or even arrest.

To protect the rights of persons seeking or receiving substance abuse treatment, mental health confidentiality laws are required. You should contact us at Findlay Recovery Center directly for the treatment centers' guidelines you should know.

The Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA) was signed into law by Congress in 1996. HIPAA provides the industry standard for securing and keeping patient health information confidential, among other things. When patient information is communicated or transferred electronically, HIPAA requires substance addiction treatment centers, health care professionals, and anyone involved in patient care, such as health plans and health care clearinghouses, to protect it.
