Detox – The first part of the process is the detox. After you have been assessed, you will go through the detox process. This involves the drugs being removed from your body after prolonged abuse. This can be a very difficult and challenging process for a lot of people, but it is a vital part of the process to ensure your body is cleansed of these substances so that you are ready both mentally and physically for the work that lies ahead while in rehab.

Therapy – Rehabs will also concentrate on therapy sessions while you are trying to recover from your addiction. There are different types of therapy that can be used, depending on your situation. Individual therapy is the most popular, as you will work on your mental state and why you reverted to drugs in the first place. What are your triggers? Knowing what your triggers are will help you to avoid them. Family counseling is another option, although it may not be suitable for everyone. However, if you have a close family who has been impacted by your addiction, this is something you may definitely want to consider.
